

Adverse Event Reporting Policy

Reporting Obligations for All Company Products

Reporting Requirements

Federal regulations and company policy require all employees, including sales representatives, to report any adverse event they become aware of, for any company product, within 24 hours.

This includes events reported informally during a sales call, mentioned by office staff, or seen in public posts on social media. Failure to report can result in regulatory action against the company and disciplinary action against the rep.

What to Capture

When reporting an adverse event, include: patient initials (if known), age range, the product involved, the event itself, and any outcome. Do not request additional clinical details from the source; medical affairs will follow up directly.

Reports may be submitted via the AE reporting form on the rep portal or by calling the medical information line. Both routes are equally valid; use whichever is faster from the field.

Common Questions

Do I report secondhand reports? Yes — if you become aware of an event from any source, including office staff or social media, you must report it within 24 hours.

Do I follow up with the patient or HCP? No. Medical affairs handles all follow-up. Your obligation ends at submission.

What if I'm not sure it qualifies as an AE? Err on the side of reporting. The triage team will determine whether the case meets the regulatory definition of an adverse event.
